PUBLIC WORKSHOPS SCHEDULED ON JAPANESE AMERICAN INTERMENT CAMP MONUMENT

Japanese Americans living along the West Coast were forcibly removed to remote internment camps during World War II without being charged of any crime. Bringing that part of our nation's history to light in a meaningful and comprehensive way is the challenge facing the National Park Service at its new National Monument in south-central Idaho: Minidoka Internment National Monument. The site of the Monument is one of 10 internment camps where Japanese Americans were incarcerated during World War II.

The National Park Service will hold eleven public workshops beginning in late July in Idaho, Washington, and Oregon to present and discuss development and management proposals for Minidoka Internment National Monument. The draft proposals encompass a wide range of actions, including the preservation and reconstruction of historic features, development of visitor and interpretive facilities both on-site and off-site, and extensive education and outreach programs. Many of these proposals are based on public comments received during public workshops held last November.

The Minidoka Relocation Center, which encompassed 33,000 acres, held over 13,000 internees from Washington, Oregon, and Alaska during its occupation from 1942 to 1945. On January 17, 2001, by Presidential proclamation, 73-acres of the original camp were designated a National Monument to be managed by the National Park Service. The purpose of Minidoka Internment National Monument is to provide opportunities for public education about the internment and incarceration experience and protect and manage resources related to the Minidoka Relocation Center.

Neil King, Superintendent of Minidoka Internment National Monument recently stated, "We have accomplished much, but there is still significant work to be done. If we are to craft the best possible plan that will guide the Monument into the future, it is very important that you (the general public) continue to participate and to help shape these critical courses of action to ensure that everyone's valuable input and points of view are considered."

The National Park Service will ask the public and former Minidoka internees what actions are best to effectively protect the site and educate the public about this chapter in American history. This is also an opportunity for the public to learn about Minidoka and its history.

PUBLIC MEETINGS SCHEDULED ON JAPANESE AMERICAN INTERMENT CAMP MONUMENT

Japanese Americans living along the West Coast were evacuated to remote internment camps from 1942 through the end of World War II without being charged of any crime. Bringing that part of our nation's history to light in a meaningful and comprehensive way is the challenge facing the National Park Service at its new National Monument in south-central Idaho: Minidoka Internment National Monument. The National Park Service will hold public open houses and workshops in mid-November to listen to the general public and learn from former Japanese American internees. The purpose of the workshops is to develop a management plan that will effectively protect the site and educate the public about this chapter in American history.

Over 13,000 internees were held at Minidoka, among them 7,000 from the Seattle area. Minidoka was one of 10 internment camps where 120,000 Japanese Americans were incarcerated during World War II. On January 17, 2001, by Presidential proclamation, 73 acres of the original site were designated as a National Monument to be managed by the National Park Service.

Little remains of the 600 buildings that once supported the Minidoka community but many of the war-time residents are still alive, and some are generously assisting the National Park Service in its work to commemorate their experience. The history they tell goes beyond the pain of relocation to the perseverance of people who built a life where they could.

"Stories of courage and loyalty will emerge as we work through the planning process," said Neil King, superintendent, who believes the site has particular poignancy today. "There is potential here for a very powerful National Monument that will have relevance for every generation. Today, we see in the aftermath of September 11 some of the same fear and suspicion that haunted our nation in World War II. We need to be sure the lessons here are passed on to future generations."

The National Park Service will hold nine public meetings, each in an open house and workshop format, at locations in Idaho, Oregon and Washington. This is an opportunity to learn about Minidoka, provide comments, raise issues, offer suggestions, and help define the future of the National Monument. These meetings represent the "scoping" stage for developing a General Management Plan for Minidoka. Anyone interested in attending is welcome.
